The sound effect is not exactly part of the audio; it is added after, or during, the recording process. In some cases, the sound that is being added is actually a musical instrument, an audio signal that has been manipulated to sound like a different instrument, such as a car horn, a drum, or a water drop hitting a bottle. In other cases, the sound that is being added is just a static sound such as a clanging bell, a static voice, or white noise. As the recording process works, the sound effect is added to the audio track, in effect making the sound "appear" as if it was present when the track was recorded.
